Abstract: This paper examines the use of politeness strategies in English and Uzbek from a linguistic and pragmatic perspective. Based on Brown and Levinson's (1987) politeness theory, the study analyzes how positive, negative, and neutral strategies are realized in these languages and cultures. English tends to use direct and explicit politeness strategies, whereas Uzbek relies on indirect expressions, honorifics, and culturally embedded politeness norms. By providing linguistic examples, cultural interpretations, and cross-cultural comparisons, this research contributes to the broader understanding of intercultural communication. The findings help identify potential areas of misunderstanding between native English and Uzbek speakers, emphasizing the importance of pragmatics in language learning and cultural adaptation.

INTRODUCTION. Language is not only a means of communication but also a reflection of cultural values and social norms. Every society has established politeness norms that dictate how individuals interact with each other. These norms vary based on culture, hierarchy, and situational context. Brown and Levinson's (1987) politeness theory introduces the concept of "face", referring to a person's self-image in social interactions. There are two main types of face:

1. Positive face: The desire to be liked, appreciated, or approved by others.
2. Negative face: The desire for autonomy, freedom from imposition, and respect for personal space.

This study investigates how these politeness strategies are used in English and Uzbek, considering both linguistic and cultural perspectives. The research identifies fundamental differences and their implications for cross-cultural communication.

Positive Politeness Strategies

Positive politeness strategies aim to strengthen social bonds, express friendliness, and show solidarity between speakers.

1. Positive Politeness in English

In English, positive politeness is commonly expressed through compliments, shared opinions, humor, and informal language. It is often used in friendly, casual conversations and business environments where maintaining good relationships is important.

Examples:

- "Wow, you're really talented at this!"
- "That's a great idea! Let's work on it together."

➤ “You look fantastic today!”

These phrases create a sense of closeness. English speakers frequently use first names, contractions, and humor to reinforce positive politeness.

2. Positive Politeness in Uzbek

Uzbek culture places strong emphasis on collectivism and respect for elders. Positive politeness is often expressed through formal greetings, honorifics, and indirect compliments. Uzbek people frequently use kinship terms (aka, opa, uka, singil) to address others politely, even if they are not family members.

Examples:

- “Sizning maslahatlaringiz juda foydali.” (Your advice is very helpful.)
- “Sizning fikringiz biz uchun qadrlı.” (Your opinion is valuable for us.)
- “Siz bilan ishlash juda yoqimli.” (It is a pleasure to work with you.)

Unlike English, where informal speech is common, Uzbek positive politeness often maintains a formal tone, especially in professional settings.

Negative Politeness Strategies

Negative politeness strategies focus on avoiding imposition, showing deference, and respecting the listener’s autonomy.

1. Negative Politeness in English

English speakers use indirectness, hedging, and apologies to avoid being too direct or imposing. This is especially common in requests, refusals, and apologies.

Examples:

- “Would you mind helping me with this?”
- “I’m sorry to interrupt, but may I ask a question?”
- “I hate to bother you, but could I borrow your book?”

The use of “would you mind...,” “I was wondering if...,” and “I’m afraid...” helps soften requests, making them sound more polite.

2. Negative Politeness in Uzbek

Uzbek speakers also employ indirect requests and honorifics to maintain politeness and respect. However, Uzbek communication tends to be even more deferential than English, especially when speaking to elders or superiors.

Examples:

- “Kechirasiz, sizni bezovta qilmayapmanmi?” (Excuse me, am I not disturbing you?)
- “Agar iloji bo‘lsa, buni keyinroq muhokama qilsak bo‘ladimi?” (If possible, can we discuss this later?)
- “Sizga noqulaylik tug‘dirmayotgan bo‘lsam, bir narsani so‘rasam maylimi?” (If I’m not causing inconvenience, may I ask something?)

In Uzbek culture, apologetic language is more frequently used to soften speech, even when making routine requests.

Neutral Politeness Strategies

Neutral politeness strategies are used in situations where neither positive nor negative politeness is emphasized. These strategies are common in formal speech, professional settings, and written communication.

1. Neutral Politeness in English

- “Can we discuss this later?”
- “Let’s move on to the next topic.”
- “It would be great if you could finish this by tomorrow.”

2. Neutral Politeness in Uzbek

- “Bu masalani keyin muhokama qilsak maylimi?” (Can we discuss this matter later?)
- “Keling, boshqa mavzuga o’tsak.” (Let’s move on to another topic.)
- “Iloji bo’lsa, bu vazifani ertaga tugatsangiz yaxshi bo’lardi.” (If possible, it would be good if you could finish this task by tomorrow.)

Cross-Cultural Differences and Case Studies

1. Directness vs. Indirectness

One of the key differences between English and Uzbek is directness.

English speakers prefer clarity and directness, even when being polite.

Uzbek speakers often use indirectness and additional politeness markers.

- ✓ Example: Asking for a favor
- ✓ English: “Can you help me with this?” (Direct but polite.)

Uzbek: “Sizni bezovta qilmaymanmi? Agar imkoningiz bo’lsa, bir narsa so’rasam maylimi?” (Indirect, more deferential.)

2. Honorifics and Social Hierarchy

Uzbek culture emphasizes respect for elders and authority figures, using honorifics such as “Siz” (formal ‘you’). In English, using “Sir” or “Ma’am” is less frequent.

CONCLUSION

This comparative study reveals that English and Uzbek employ different politeness strategies due to cultural and linguistic variations. English favors clarity and direct politeness, while Uzbek relies on indirectness and hierarchical respect. Understanding these differences is crucial for effective intercultural communication.

Key Takeaways

English prioritizes directness and efficiency in politeness.

Uzbek emphasizes indirectness, respect, and formality.

Misinterpretations may occur if these politeness norms are not understood in intercultural settings.
